"The case of Crocker vs. Hadley, decided by the Indiana Supreme Court on the 23d ult. arose upon a suit brought by the appelles to recover damages from the appelles to recover damages from the appelles to recover damages from the appelles and the publication by him ed an alleged libel. The libelous sarticle declared among other things that the appelles was "a hoary-headed filcher," and he hat "sold him elf, Judas-like, for a few pieces of suver, to sen ms neighbors out." The supreme Court on appeal held these charges libelous and said that it was not necessary that a crime should be charged in accurate and technical language in a written or printed publication in order to constitute such publication at libel, but that any written or printed publication which holds a person up to seven or ridicale or to a stronger feeling of Contenut, or execution, or which inputes or implies his commission of a crime not directly charged, is a libelous publication,"
